

To our valued customers:

We understand some of our customers have expressed concerns about the possibility of contaminated seafood products from Japan. We use a wide variety of seafood products from around the world, a majority of which originate from countries other than Japan. However, those products still coming from Japan originate from areas far removed from the area of concern on Japan’s northeast coast.

1. U.s Homeland Security Secretary Janet Napolitano states that all airline passengers and cargo arriving in the United States from Japan are being checked for radiation. Secretary Napolitano indicates these checks are only an exercise of precaution and just to make sure that everyone remains safe. She adds that no harmful radiation has been detected on any incoming cargo.
2. The FDA has announced it is closely monitoring the situation in Japan and is working with numerous agencies to continue to ensure that foods imported from Japan remain safe. FDA is taking all steps to evaluate and measure any possible contamination in fish or seafood presented for import into the U.S. FDA states there is no risk to the U.S. food supply at this time and the agency does not have concerns regarding the safety of imported food products from Japan. Additional information can be found on FDA’s website at www.fda.com
